The Korean alphabet was formulated in 1446 during the kingship of King Sejong, who reigned as the Fourth King from 1418 - 1450. Before the alphabet was formulated, the Chinese alphabet was used to write out Korean words. The shapes of the Korean consonants are based on the shape the mouth makes when the sound is made. The basic form of a sentence is Subject, Object, Verb, the verb being the only required element. In English, One might say I like candy, but in Korean, one would say the equivalent I candy like. There are two sets of numbers commonly used, one from Chinese and one native to Korea. Either can be used, though not together. Most of the vocabulary is made up of native words, but there are many words that have been borrowed from Chinese as well as Japanese. English has also made its way into Korean, and there are many who speak a mixture of both.
